

Attachment Theory and the Development of Personality Dysfunction

Thursday 13 December 2018

The Met Hotel, King Street, Leeds, LS1 2HQ

12.30pm Registration and Lunch , 1.00pm Welcome and 4.30pm, Close

Attachment theory is a developmental paradigm that helps clinicians understand how adverse childhood experiences can lead to the later psychopathology. This can be communicated easily to service users; and many service users say that it helps them by enabling them to think about trying to change relational patterns based on previous attachments. It enables clinicians to make better quality formulations which are helpful for complex cases.

The aim of this training event is to use current research evidence to show how attachment theory informs an understanding of the normal development of personality; and how insecurity of attachment leads to the development of personality dysfunction and disorders. Implications for therapeutic intervention will also be described based on published evidence.

This course aims to provide delegates with:

- Knowledge of the relevance of attachment theory for personality development
- Knowledge of how disruption of attachment security in childhood can be a risk factor for adult personality disorder development
- Knowledge of the implications for therapeutic interventions

About our speaker:

Dr Adshead is a forensic psychiatrist and psychotherapist. She is trained as a group analyst, mindfulness based cognitive therapist and in the use of mentalisation based therapy (MBT). She works with men and women with complex needs; usually those who have committed acts of violence and experienced chronic trauma. Dr Adshead has co-edited several textbooks, including two on the topic of personality disorder. The book she edited with Dr Jay Sarkar (Clinical topics in personality Disorder) was awarded first prize in the psychiatry section in the BMJ Book Awards in 2013. Dr Adshead was awarded the President's Medal for her work in psychiatric ethics in 2013; and was appointed Gresham Professor of Psychiatry in 2014.
